Survey of civil servants show morale may be at risk

On Thursday, 28 January, the results of the first Civil Service Employee Engagement Survey were published. This survey, part of the October 2014 Civil Service renewal plan, had more than 15,500 civil servants respond to over one hundred statements. This accounts for nearly 40% of the Civil Service workforce.

Some of the main findings are as follows:

• 64% felt that the work they did had a positive impact.
• However, only 19% believe their work is valued by the public. Only 15% believe that the public respects and appreciates their work.
• 70% said they were enthusiastic about their work; 10% were not.
• Only 27% feel that they are adequately rewarded for their work.
• Only 32% said that new ideas were welcome in the workplace; just 22% feel that their department cares about their views or goals.
• The percentage of those who felt poor performance at work by colleagues was dealt with effectively was very low, at 12%.

Minister for Communications Alex White TD said he found the results of the survey discouraging. Speaking at the Ireland eGovernment Awards Ceremony on Friday 29 January, he said that the perception that the work of public servants is not valued “could have a corrosive impact on staff morale – and potentially service delivery itself – if it is not addressed. “We mustn’t forget the huge contribution that public servants have made to this recovery, or how they maintained, and indeed improved, services during the worst economic crisis in the history of this state, and against the background of pay cuts and a 10% decline in staff numbers”.

According to the Minister, “more needs to be done to highlight both the challenges and achievements of public service delivery”.

Network for migrant workers launched

Last Friday, 29 January, SIPTU officially launched their Migrant and International Workers Network. In the last census in 2011, there were 268,180 non-nationals at work, representing 15.1% of the workforce. With growing employment, it is reasonable to assume that this number will have increased in the proceeding five years.

The Support Network coordinator, Joanna Ozdarska, said that its purpose was to enable migrant workers to support themselves and their communities.

SIPTU’s annual Migrant Workers conference, where the Network was launched, was addressed by Minister of State Aodhán Ó Riordáin TD, SIPTU General President, Jack O’Connor and migrant worker activists. It involved workshops on topics such as training and innovations, and workers’ rights.

Another Support Network coordinator, Evelina Saduikyte, said: “The aim of the Support Network is to organise and support migrant workers effectively and fully participate in union activity. Workers regardless of their country of origin have a shared objective in sustaining and improving working conditions.”
Access to data is necessary, says Interpol agent

Last Thursday was International Data Protection Day, also referred to as International Privacy Day. Ireland is currently in a very interesting situation with regard to the use and access to personal data.

Last week, it came to light that the Garda Síochána Ombudsman (Gsoc) had gained access to the telephone records of journalists; a review into how this happened has been ordered by Frances Fitzgerald TD, Minister for Justice. Digital Rights Ireland are also currently undergoing a court challenge against mass retention of data by service providers.

This morning, the Irish Times printed the comments of a member on the Gardaí currently working for Interpol. His comments were, on the whole, an explanation and a justification of the use of mobile phone and internet data for investigative purposes.

He commented that in jurisdictions where phone and internet service providers were not required by law to retain data, there was a distinct advantage for criminals. He compared data kept to items kept in your own home – a judge would grant a search warrant of your home if there was “reasonable and appropriate” belief of wrongdoing; he maintains it is the same with personal data.

He went on to say that, “the most commonly requested information was metadata. This includes the identity of the sender and recipients of calls, texts and emails as well as the times and locations those communications took place. As none of the content of the messages is being sought, privacy is less of an issue than the permission of a court is normally not required.”

However, if the investigatory body want a copy of the content, they must get permission as there is a greater expectations of privacy.

New rules for grocery sector

The Minister for Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation, Richard Bruton TD has just signed a set of regulations into law regarding practices in the grocery goods sector. The go some way to “ensuring that dealings in the sector are fair and substantial”:

The following areas are addressed:
- Goods contracts are now required in writing;
- Contracts can only be terminated with express consent from both parties;
- Provisions will be made for force majeure (non-performance due to extenuating circumstances);
- Retailers may be asked to provide a forecast of goods required;
- Suppliers must be paid in 30 days;
- Suppliers being asked to pay for prime shelf space, or stocking goods will be prohibited; and
- Retailers or wholesalers must complete a yearly compliance statement.

The Minister said, “Relationships will continue to be based on commerce and prices will continue to be set by hard negotiations – this is in the interests of consumers … These measures together with strong enforcement powers will ensure that these relationships are fair and sustainable.”
